A SQUARE DEAL

That the Republicans of Delaware have made no mistake in nominating Senator Charles R. Miller for Governor is plainly illustrated by Mr. Miller's talk before the Republicans of this section on Wednesday evening. Mr. Miller said in part:

"The prosperity which is observable on every hand throughout our state, would indicate that there does not seem to be good grounds for asking our people to vote for a change at the approaching election. There are no men unemployed, except those who belong to that class which do not wish to work. The continued improvement in conditions during the past few years indicates a bettering of the conditions of our mechanics, farmers, merchants and laboring class. Nowhere throughout our state is there evidence that affairs are either standing still or going backward, but quite the reverse is evidenced by the material advancement in all lines of business and employment throughout this state. It is for the people to consider well these conditions, and come to an unprejudiced conclusion, before voting, to adopt a course which would tend to bring about new conditions. We can know and see what we now have, but if the present course of affairs is altered, no one can forecast what may follow. It would seem the part of good judgment to hold fast to that which is good; to hold fast to that which we now have and resolve to appreciate and retain the prosperity which is here present.

"In a political campaign, there are time when the candidates are misjudged by articles which appear from time to time in the press, of which they have no knowledge, and I take this opportunity in stating that I reserve the right to stand for myself in this campaign, and assume no responsibility for what any newspaper may say, and I deprecate, most sincerely, the unfairness of an attack made against the Democratic nominee for governor, on account of his absence from the Senate when the vote was taken on the repeal of the voters' assistant bill. His absence on account of the death of his mother was an all-sufficient reason which would appeal to the sympathies of every right thinking person."

THERE will be six tickets on the official ballot this year, namely, Democratic, Republican, two Progressives, Prohibition and Socialist.

Standard Bell Equipment

All the Bell instruments, all the Bell lines and all the Bell equipment are tested, tried and standardized—the same here, in Philadelphia, San Francisco and Everywhere. This assures the best transmission and keeps the service always up to the highest standard.

The Bell standard telephone equipment is the best known today and it is used the world over by people who demand quality.

Of the $58,000,000 that will be spent by the Bell System for new construction and equipment during the present year, over $2,800,000 will go for enlargements and improvements of the Bell plant in our own and adjacent cities,—all within a radius of eighty miles of Philadelphia.

We can point with pride to our fine telephone plant in this vicinity and in all the surrounding sections of the country—each locality with standardized equipment sufficient to handle any emergency and to take care of prospective growth within the next few years, and additions and improvements are constantly being made to maintain the high Bell standard. That we are aiming still higher is evidenced by the unusual further investment made during 1912.

Here is evidence that the Bell System's policy is one of continuous improvement and expansion.

Does it not follow that the Bell must give standard service?

DEDICATION OF OLD CHURCH

The Dedication of St. Francis Xavier's Church, (Old Bohemia) took place October 24th at 10.30 o'clock. Though the weather was unfavorable there was a large attendance. There were present fourteen priests: Fathers Edward Brady, Thomas Waldron, John Ryan S. J., Martin Ryan, James J. Money, John J. Dougherty, James L. McSweeney, John Walsh, Charles P. McGoldrich, Edward C. Higgins, E. J. Devitt S. J., C. Gorman S. J., C. W. Lyons S. J., and C. A. Crowley.

The walls of the Church were blessed by solemn rites by the Rt. Rev. J. J. Monaghan D. D. Bishop of Wilmington, The Rev. C. A. Crowley assisted by Rev. C. P. McGoldrich, Deacon and Rev. Edward C. Higgins, Subdeacon sang Solemn High Mass. The Rev. John Ryan S. J., and Rev. Thomas Waldron, Pastor of St. Pauls Wilmington were Deacons of Honor. The Rev. Martin Ryan was Master of Ceremonies.

The music rendered by the choir received and deserved much praise. The sermon preached by the Very Rev. C. W. Lyons S. J. dwell particularly on the history of Old Bohemia as the Mother house of Catholicity of Delaware and Pennsylvania. He mentioned also that this was the nucleous of Catholic College in America from which Georgetown University sprang. He mentioned many of the early Fathers noble, heroic, saintly Fathers who founded Old Bohemia who "spent and were spent" in a noble cause which was the salvation of souls. And again he said the past history of this church was one to be proud of the present not less so and we hope that the future will be as great if not greater. The Pastor Rev. C. A. Crowley came in for his quota of praise as well as the laity who contributed so generously to the rebuilding of this—you may say—ancient church. The church for its size is one of the most beautiful on the Eastern Shore.

FARMERS HAVE GOOD YEAR

TOWNSEND, October 22 —This has been a prosperous year for farmers and fruit growers, notwithstanding the high cost of living. Delaware farms have never been developed to so great an extent as they have this year and in return the crops have never been so plentiful. Fortunately, the prices have also been good. To begin with, the asparagus crop was a profitable one, followed by a large and money-producing strawberry yield. Peas were a fair average payer while white potatoes brought smiles to the farmer's face who had planted any amount at all. Early apples were only moderately profitable compared with former years, but the tomato crop which came next, has been an exceptionally good payer, not only to the farmer but to the canner and to the hundreds who were employed in the factories. Cantaloupes and peaches were good crops this year, cantaloupes especially. There are only in their infancy as a Delaware crop but showed such promise that large acreages are promised next year. To wind up the season the pear crop is not only large, but green pears are in demand and good prices being paid. Corn is unusually large and new corn jumped into the market three weeks ago at 65c a bushel, while last year it was offered at 40c. Old corn has been bringing as high 95 cents. Merchants in all the towns are feeling the effects of the good crops and business is brisk.

BOY KILLED ON RAIL

Theodore Lovegrove, Aged 6 Years Killed at Townsend

Attempting to cross the railroad tracks in front of the station at Townsend Wednesday afternoon, Theodore Lovegrove, aged 8 years, a son of Edward Lovegrove, of near Smyrna, was struck and instantly killed by the special train carrying William Jennings Bryan and party on Mr. Bryan's tour of Delaware. Mr. Bryan was not appraised of the awful accident at the time, as he was sleeping in his car and did not know a stop had been made.

The accident was witnessed by a few people who were standing on the platform at Townsend. Mr. Bryan's special train was not scheduled to stop there, and the residents had not come out to see him. The special was running behind the schedule that had been mapped out for Mr. Bryan, and it was making great speed when the accident occurred.

Lovegrove had been in Townsend visiting his uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. James Lovegrove. He and a boy about his own age, a son of Eugene Savin, of Townsend, had been playing about town and were on their way home. They went to the station, and after a northbound train had passed, the two little fellows started to cross the tracks, apparently unaware of the special train which was thundering down the road and within a short distance of them.

Savin got across the tracks in safety. Lovegrove, however, was less fortunate and the pilot on the locomotive struck him. His little body was hurled with such force that it struck a heavy baggage truck standing on the station platform and the truck was overturned by the impact. The boy's skull was crushed, and practically every bone in his body was broken.

The special was brought to a stop as quickly as possible and run back to the station. The train crew and C. P. Holcomb, of Mr. Bryan's party, got off to investigate. After a stop of ten minutes, the train continued. It was said Mr. Bryan was sleeping in his car and had not been aroused.

Undertaker S. A. Collins, of Townsend, took charge of the body. He reported the accident to Coroner Chandler.

Death of Honora Dorsey

There passed away from earth early on the morning of Sunday, October 12th, 1912, Honora Dorsey, the beloved wife of Patrick Dorsey an old and highly esteemed resident of Cecil County. She was born in County Limerick, Ireland, about eighty years ago and came to Maryland when yet a child, to a sister who was already living in America. Here she met her husband Patrick Dorsey, who wooed and won her heart and hand and they were married in the historic old church at Bohemia Manor nearly sixty years ago.

They prospered, and a large family, three girls and ten boys, were born to the union, all of whom, save one boy survive. Those who knew her well will hear willing testimony to the beauty of her character and the wonderful affection she manifested toward her family and her legion of friends. She was truly loved by all who knew her. Of a quiet retiring disposition she displayed an interest in everything which would tend to make her husband and children comfortable and happy and tender the house in which they lived so long truly a home.

Nor did she neglect her Lord. She was deeply religious and whatever tended to promote the service of the Almighty received her cheerful support and hearty co-operation. May she rest in peace!

Death of Frank Eliason

The remains of Frank Eliason, formerly of near Middletown, were brought here on Tuesday and interred in Forest cemetery. Mr. Eliason was aged 59 years, and died at the home of Mr. and Mrs. David Boulden, in New Castle on Sunday night after an illness of several weeks. He was a son of Mrs. Scowdrick, who died here several months ago. He leaves a widow and a married daughter. Funeral services were held in New Castle on Tuesday afternoon and the remains arrived in Middletown on the 3 30 P. M. train, interment being made in the family plot at Forest cemetery. The pall-bearers were: R. R. Cochran, Julian Cochran, Frank J. Pennington, John S. Crouch, Charles H. Salmon and Andrew S. Eliason.

National Corn Club

The office of farm management under the United States Department of Agriculture advises us there is going to be a great innovation in the interest of the boys, members of the National Corn Club at Columbia, S. C., next January, during the national corn show. The plan is to organize for entertainment there of 1,000 boys to attend the school and exposition. It is suggested that Delaware should be represented by some boys who have the highest records in our State, to be accompanied by the county school superintendent. This is a matter that each county should take up with their boards of trade and local bankers. With the opening of the Panama canal in the near future and the increase of trade with South America, anything that will help for the development of resources of Delaware must be grasped when available.

Rabbits Plentiful

It is nothing unusual at this time of the year in driving through the country to see the "cotton tails" scampering across the road. Farmers and others who travel through Delaware report that the rabbits were never so plentiful at this time. Sportsmen are anticipating an unusually good gunning season this fall and winter.

The Weather Prophet

The weather prophet is around with his impressions. He says the goose bone shows lots of snow; the squirrel and other like animals are laying in a big store of nuts and other food; the fur on their backs is unusually thick, and there is snow and extremely cold weather in England; all of which goes to show that we are to have a long, cold winter.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

On the Sands.

A man, bearing in his arms the motionless form of a woman, paused later that night in the shadow of a low stone hovel, near the lower gate of the Mount. As he crouched beneath the thatch projecting like the rim of an old hat above him his eyes, eager, fierce, studied the distance he had yet to traverse from the end of the narrow alley, where he had stopped, to the open entrance at the base of the rock to the sands. The goal was not far; but a few moments would have sufficed to reach it; only between him and the point he had so long been striving to attain, an obstacle, or group of obstacles, intervened. Before a bonfire of wreckage of stuff—furniture and household goods—several ragged, dissolute fellows sat with bottles before them, drinking hard and quarreling the while over a number of glittering gems, gold snuffboxes and trinkets of all kinds.

"This bit of ivory for the white stone!"

"Add the brooch!"

"Not I! Look at the picture! Her ladyship, perhaps!"

"They have not found her?"

"No; for all the searching! But she is somewhere; can't have escaped from the Mount. And when the drabs and trulls lay hands on her!"

"Ay, when!" casting the dice.

The man, peering from the alley, hesitated no longer; behind sounded the footsteps of others, and gathering his burden more firmly, he strode boldly forth toward the group and the gate. At his approach, their talk—a jargon of "thieves' Latin" that smacked more of the cabarets of Paris than those of the coast—momentarily ceased; beneath lowering brows, they stared hard.

"What have you there, comrade?" said one.

"Look and see!" answered the man in a rough tone.

"Poor booty! A woman!' quoted another with a harsh laugh. "You're easily pleased. As if wenches were not plentiful enough on other occasions, without wasting time on a night like this, when diamonds and gold are to be had for the searching!"

"And silver plates and watches and rare liquors!" cried a third in knaves' argot. "Every one, however, to his taste; An you prefer a light-of-love to light such as these have," juggling with the gems, "you but stamp yourself a fool."

"You're welcome to your opinion, my friend!" The man with the burden spoke bruskly. "Good night!"

"Stay; why such haste? You seem not a bad fellow. Set the wench down. We'll have sight of her, and, perhaps," with coarse expletives, "if she's a pretty face, and a taste for this fiery liquor the old monks laid down, we'll find a gewgaw or two to her liking!"

But the man made no answer; was about to pass on, when the speaker noticed for the first time the woman's hand, white and small, hanging limply "What's this? More jewels?" His exclamation was caught up by the others. "Not so fast, comrade! This puts a different face to the matter. Set down the booty, and," springing to his feet, "we'll see what it's worth."

"I'll not stop!" The man looked at him steadily. "On the Mount is, or should be, plenty for all! Go seek for yourself!"

"Pardi!" softly. "Here's one dares speak his mind!

"I speak plainly," in a tone of authority, "and you would do well to heed!"

"Perhaps," interposing. "What say you, comrades?"

Evil smiles illumined evil faces; they, who had just been on the point of blows among themselves, now regarded one another with common understanding. One weighed tentatively that delicate weapon, a spontoon; a second stroked his halberd, as liking to feel the smoothness of the shaft, while a third reached for a gleaming "Folard's Partizan." And in the glare of the fire every implement showed sign it had been used that night. The point of the spontoon was as steel crusted o'er; the ax of the halberd might have come from a boucherie; the blade of the "Partizan" resembled a great leaf at autumn-time. This last wavered perilously near the unconscious burden; had the man made a movement to resist, would have struck; but the black eyes, only, combated—held the blood-shot ones. Though not for long; again the weapon seemed about to dart forth; the man about to hurl himself and his burden desperately aside, when, from above, came the sound of hoarse laughter and singing, and simultaneously a number of peasants, Bretons by their dress, burst into view.

"Eh, cockatoo, what now!"

Many of these new-comers were hurt; few free from cuts; but none thought of stanching their wounds. Their principal concern seemed for articles they carried—heavy, light; valuable, paltry—spoils from the high! Two staggered beneath a great chest stamped with the arms of the Mount and its motto, and appeared anxious to hurry—perchance toward the forest on the shore where they might bury their treasure. Others had in their arms imposing pieces of silver; vases and a massive surtout de table that had once belonged to the Cardinal Dubois. A woman, gaunt, toothless, wore a voluminous bonnet a l'Argus, left at the Mount by one of the ladies of the court; and waved before her a fan, set with jewels. She it was who called out:

"Eh, cockatoo!" shrilly. "Who would you be killing?"

"A selfish fellow that refuses to share!" answered he of the halberd, as if little pleased at the interruption.

"Refuses to share, does he?" she repeated, and, swaggering down, peered forward; only to start back. "The Black Seigneur!"

"The Black Seigneur!"

Those who accompanied her—a rough rabble from field and forest—gazed, not without surprise, or uncouth admiration, at one whose name and fame were well known on that northern coast; but these evidences of rough approval were not shared by the alien rogues. On my lady's finger the gem sparkled; held their eyes like a lure. Black Seigneur, or not, they muttered sullenly, what knew they of her he had with him; whose hand was not that of cinder-wench or scullery maid? Let them look at her face! She might be a great lady—she might be the Governor's daughter herself!

"The Governor's daughter!" All, alike, caught at the word.

"And if she were!" fiercely the Black Seigneur confronted them.

While, hesitating, they sought for a reply, quickly he went on. Who had a better right to her? The Black Seigneur! The Lady Elise! Harshly he laughed. Was it not fair spoil? His Excellency's enemy; his Excellency's daughter. Did they think treasure sweeter than revenge? Let them try to rob him of it! As for the ring? Contemptuously he took it from my lady's hand; threw it among them.

A few scrambled, others were still for finishing the tragedy then. The people versus the lords and their spawn. "Kill at once!" the injunction had gone forth from Paris.

As he spoke, one of the fiercest put out his hand; touched my lady, when the fingers of the Black Seigneur gripped hard his throat; hurled him so violently back, he lay still. Companions sprang to his aid; certain of the peasants interfered.

"Let him alone!"

"He speaks fair!"

"Bah! Tonight all are equal."

"Your Black Seigneur is no better than others!"

"You lie!" In a high tone the woman with the great lady's hat broke in. "At them, my chickens! Beat well these Paris rogues, who come only for the picking!"

"Yes; beat them well!"

But the runagates of the great city were not of a kind to submit lightly; curses and blows were exchanged; knives gleamed and swords flashed. Amid a scene of confusion, the cause of it stayed not to witness the outcome; running down the sloping way, soon found himself on the sands; then keeping to the shadows, passed around the corner of the wall.

Here, for the time concealed was he safe; none followed, and, leaning against the damp blocks of masonry, breathing hard, as a man weak from fatigue, loss of blood, he sought to recover his strength. It returned only too slowly; the passing lassitude annoyed him; for the moment he forgot he had but recently come from the dungeon and the hardships that sap elasticity and vigor. He was impatient to move on; looked at my lady—and a sudden fear smote him! How white she appeared! Had she— His hand trembled at her heart; a blank dismay overcame him; then joy— At that instant he thought not of the gulf between them; was conscious only he held her—slender, beautiful—in his arms; that she seemed all his own, with her breath on his cheek, her soft lips so close. Above sounded the madness of the night; the crackling of flames; the intemperate voices! In the angle of the will, with darkness a blanket around them, he pushed back the hair from her clear brow, bent over, closer—suddenly straightened.

"Pardi!" he muttered, a flush on his face. "Am I, then, like the others, pillagers, thieves?"

Several moments he yet stood, breathing deep; then, starting away, set himself to the task of crossing the vast stretch of beach between the Mount and the distant lights of a ship.

The sandy plain had never seemed so interminable; before him, his shadow and that of my lady danced ever illusively away; behind, the great rock gave forth a hundred shooting flames, while, as emblematic of the demolition of so much that was beautiful, higher than saint with helpless sword on cathedral top, a cloud of smoke belched up; waved sidewise like a monstrous funeral plume. A symbol, it seemed to fill the sky; to move and nod and flaunt its ominous blackness from this majestic outpost of the land. Walking in a vivid crimson glow, the Black Seigneur gazed only ahead, where now, on that monotonous desert, the rim of the sea on a sudden obtruded. As he advanced, sparkles red as rubies—laughing lights—leaped in the air; at the same time a seething murmur broke upon the stillness.

Toward those leaping bright points and the source of that deep-sounding cadence, the young man stumbled forward more rapidly, less cautiously, also, it may be; for while he was yet some distance from the water's rim, his feet fell on sand that gave way beneath them. He would have sprung back, but felt himself sinking; strove to get out, only to settle the deeper! The edge of the lise, with safety beyond, well he could see, where the satin-like smoothness of the treacherous slough merged into a welcome silk-like shimmering of the trustworthy sands. That verge, however, was remote; out of reach of effort of his to attain; his very endeavors caused him to become the more firmly imbedded. Had he cast my lady aside, possibly could he have extricated himself; but with her, an additional weight, weighing him down—

Loudly he called out; only the sea answered. Now were the clinging particles at his waist; he lifted my lady higher; clear of them! Once more raised his voice—this time not in vain!

"Mon capitaine! Where are you?"

"Here!"

"We don't see you."

"You won't soon, unless—"

The end of a line struck the sand.

The night had almost passed; its last black hour, like a pall, lay over the sea, where, far from the Mount, a ship swayed and tossed. In the narrow confines of her master's cabin, the faint glimmering of a lamp revealed a man bending over a paper, yellow and worn; the lines so faint and delicate, they seemed almost to escape him!

How strange, after all these years, the sight of your handwriting!—and now, to be writing you! Yet is it meet—to say farewell! For that which you have heard, mon ami, is true. I am going to die. You say, you heard I was not well; I answer what really you heard; the question, mon ami, beneath your words! . . . And, dying, it is well with me. I have wronged no soul on earth—except you, my friend, and you forgive me. . . . I had hoped the years would efface that old memory. You say they have not. . . . It is wise. you are going away.

The reader paused; listened to the sea; the moaning and sighing, like voices on the wings of the storm.

You speak in your letter about "trickery"—used to estrange us! Think no more of it, I beg you. What is past, is gone—as I, part of that past, when we were boy and girl together—soon shall be. And come not near the Mount. There can be no meeting for us on earth. I send you my adieu from afar. . . . It is only a shadow that speaks . . . mon ami.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Some Time Later.

The little Norman isle, home of Pierre Laroche, so wild and bleak-looking many months of the year, resembles a flowering garden in the spring; then, its lap full of buds and blossoms, smiling, redolent, it lifts itself from the broad bosom of the deep. And all the light embellishments of the golden time it sets forth daintily; fringing the black cliffs with clusters of sea campion, white and frothy as the spray, trailing green ivy from precipitous heights to the verge of the wooing waters, whose waves seem to creep up timorously, peep into the many caves, bright with sea-anemones, and retreat quickly, as awed by a sudden glimpse of fairyland.

Near the entrance of one of these magical chambers, abloom with strange, scentless flowers, sat, a certain afternoon in April, a man and a woman, who, looking out over the blue sea, conversed in desultory fashion.

"From what your father tells me, Mistress Nanette," the man, an aged priest, was speaking, "the Seigneur Desaurac should be here today?"

"My father had a letter from him a few days ago to that effect," answered the young woman somewhat shortly.

"Let me see," apparently the old man did not notice the change in his companion's manner, "he has been away now about a year? It was in July he brought the Governor's daughter to the island one day and sailed the next!" Nanette made a movement. "How time flies!" he sighed. "Let us hope it assuages grief, as they say! You think she is contented here?"

"The Lady Elise? Why not? At least, she seems so; has with her, her old nurse, my aunt, who fortunately escaped from the Mount—"

"But the death of her father? It must have been a terrible blow—one not easy to forget!"

"Of course," said Nanette slowly, "she has felt his loss."

The old man gazed down. "I have sometimes wondered what she knows about the causes of the enmity that existed between his Excellency and the Black Seigneur?"

The other's eyes lifted keenly. "When last did you see her, Father?"

"She comes often to my cottage to walk and—"

"Talk?"

"Well, yes!" The fine, spiritual face expressed a twinge of uneasiness.

"About the past?"

The priest shifted slightly. "Sometimes! An old man lives much in the past and it is natural to wander on a bit aimlessly at times, and—"

"Confess, Father, she has learned much from you?" Nanette laughed.

"No, no; I trust—"

"Surmised, then!" said the girl. "She is one not easily deceived. Clever is my lady! And you talk, she says nothing, but leads you on! If there's aught she wishes to learn that you know, be assured she's found out from your lips."

"Nay; I'll not believe—'tis true once or twice I've let a word slip. But she noticed not—"

"No doubt!" The island girl's voice expressed a fine scorn. "However, it matters little. Speaks she ever of the Black Seigneur?" suddenly.

Curbed a Natural Curiosity.

"No. Why?"

"Why not?" Nanette's tone was enigmatic.

"I don't understand."

"At any rate, she is better off here than yonder in France, if tidings be true," said the other irrelevantly.

"Ah, ma belle France!" murmured the old man regretfully. "How she is torn within—threatened from without! But fortunately she has her defenders," his voice thrilled, "brave men who have thronged to her needs. I suppose," he continued abruptly, "it's to arrange about the new ship that brings the Seigneur once more to the island?"

"I suppose so," assented the other briefly.

"A true Frenchman, Pierre Laroche, your father, has shown himself, in giving one of his best ships to the cause! Although perhaps he would not have been so ready," thoughtfully, "had not the Paris Assembly seen fit to appoint Andre Desaurac in command of all the vessels to guard the coast against the intrigues of the French royalists with foreign powers and aliens! Well, well, he will find here many old friends!"

"Yourself, for example, Father, who helped him in the courts to establish his right to his name," said the young woman quickly.

"And you, Mistress Nanette," the kindly eyes lighting with a curious, indulgent look, "who went to the Mount alone, unaided, to—"

A frown gathered on the dark, handsome face of the girl. "Unaided?" she said, staring at the sparkles on the waves before her.

"Oh, the people never weary of talking about it! and how you—"

"Yon's a sail!" Abruptly the young woman rose; with skirts fluttering behind her, gazed out to sea.
